

edge," says the source. "People were pushing her to go in there. . . . She's been partying hard for a while." Too hard, according to some. During her roughly two-year relationship with Jake Gyllenhaal, Dunst "was not going out as much," says a source. But her nightlife amped up again after their '04 breakup (hitting London pubs while dating rocker Johnny Borrell in '07), though she told Jane magazine in May, "I'd rather be with someone I love, at home making dinner, than be single, for sure." Friends say some of Dunst's struggle stems from being in the spotlight since age 12, when she starred in Interview with the Vampire. "Everyone has problems," says a friend. "But not everyone has to deal with them in a fishbowl." Now, says the friend, Dunst is getting the help she needs: "She's trying to take a break. It's a great thing." A rep for Dunst had no statement.

Britney Spears

Hello, Students, I'm Ms. Spears

BRITNEY DANCE

Singer. Dancer. Tabloid Princess. Teacher? Taking a break from her much-publicized personal troubles, Britney Spears commandeered children's classes on Feb. 11 and 12 at the Millennium Dance Complex (below) in North Hollywood. "Britney asked me if she could teach a class, and we scheduled it," said Robert Baker, director of the studio. "Everyone ended up having a blast. All the kids hugged Britney, and she seemed very happy." Spears taught the children, aged 4 to 7, choreographed routines to Madonna songs like "True Blue" and "Holiday." "She even played age-appropriate games in a circle, pretending to be a choo-choo train," Baker added. Though one parent thought teaching was inappropriate for Spears, who has lost custody of her children, most took pictures of Spears with their kids. After class, Spears, who often practices routines at Millennium, stayed another 90 minutes to work on her moves.
